REPUBLICANS CHALLENGED TO SEEK BACKING AMONG URBAN MINORITIES

By ROBIN SPENCER

Two New Hampshire Republican congressional committee leaders are currently being considered for appointment to high-level posts in the Nixon administration. The leaders, William Proctor, chairman of the House Republican Conference, and Tom Barry, chairman of the Senate Republican Conference, are both considered to be key figures in the efforts of the Republican Party to regain control of the Congress.

The appointment of these leaders to high-level positions could have significant implications for the future of the Republican Party. If confirmed, Proctor and Barry would be among the highest-ranking Republicans in the government, and their influence could extend to all areas of government policy.

Proctor, who currently heads the House Republican Conference, is known for his strong leadership and his ability to bring Republicans together. He has been a vocal critic of the Democratic Party and has been involved in many major political decisions during his tenure.

Barry, who currently heads the Senate Republican Conference, is also known for his strong leadership and his ability to bring Republicans together. He has been a vocal critic of the Democratic Party and has been involved in many major political decisions during his tenure.
