Tripod Lectures: Oratorioal Milestone

The Seven Liberal Arts

By Professor Harry Todd Costello

I have told students at times that the essence of distinguishing a speaker, military or civil, on our campus at Commencement and other occasions is to say, "What our professors used to hand out was not so bad after all. And now we have come to think the old stuff has been called philosophy."

Dr. Russell, in his famous address on the sociology of education, said: "Curiously enough, the degree of Aristotelian, defended, as Bertrand Russell has said, is not the only subject positively sanctioned systematically from first principles, an Art being the Roman name for a subject of study, such as the Liberal Arts, Medicine, and Architecture. Geography is not to be included as a liberal subject, and the Liberal Arts is the name for a subject that is not a subject of study."

But, as you know, the Seven Liberal Arts have been the subject of discussion since the time of the ancients. They are the seven arts of the Latin alphabet: Grammar, Rhetoric, Logic, Arithmetic, Geometry, Music, and Astronomy. The seven liberal arts are the seven liberal professions, and it is from them that we derive our present-day disciplines such as the seven liberal arts.

The followers of Pythagoras were a religious fraternity, whose religious worship was the chanting of religious songs, and whose doctrine was based on the seven sacred numbers. They believed in the seven days of creation, and the seven planets of the solar system.

The first liberal art was Grammar, which was concerned with the study of language. The second liberal art was Rhetoric, which was concerned with the study of oratory. The third liberal art was Logic, which was concerned with the study of reasoning. The fourth liberal art was Arithmetic, which was concerned with the study of numbers. The fifth liberal art was Geometry, which was concerned with the study of shapes.

The sixth liberal art was Music, which was concerned with the study of sound and its relationships. The seventh liberal art was Astronomy, which was concerned with the study of the stars and the planets.

The seven liberal arts were a system of thought that was based on the idea that all knowledge was derived from the seven liberal arts. The seven liberal arts were the foundation of all knowledge, and they were the basis of all education.

In conclusion, the seven liberal arts were a system of thought that was based on the idea that all knowledge was derived from the seven liberal arts. The seven liberal arts were the foundation of all knowledge, and they were the basis of all education.
